I The sleeping place of men or animals

1 A permanent structure or arrangement for sleeping on, or for the sake of rest. In some form or other it constitutes a regular article of household furniture in civilized life, as well as part of the equipment of an army or expedition. It consists for the most part of a sack or mattress of sufficient size, stuffed with something soft or springy, raised generally upon a 'bed-stead' or support, and covered with sheets, blankets, etc. for the purpose of warmth. The name is given both to the whole structure in its most elaborate form, and, as in 'feather-bed,' to the stuffed sack or mattress which constitutes its essential part. (A person is said to be in bed, when undressed and covered with the bedclothes.)

[The development of this (the chief extant) sense, the antiquity of which is shown not merely by the OS fyr bētan, but by its existence in the other Teutonic languages (cf Du vuur boeten, LG fur boten, etc), is somewhat obscure, from the fact that in the earliest instances it appears to mean, not 'to mend a fire,' but as in modern Dutch, 'to make, kindle, put on a fire' Perhaps this is to be explained by the primitive conditions (which prevailed more or less till the days of phosphorus matches), according to which fire was not generated anew each time it was required, but was usually propagated by a 'glede from an existing fire, often carried and kept alive for days (cf Genesis XXII 6), which was surrounded with combustibles, and 'beeted into a blaze, when a fire was required]

Beetle (bī t l), †a in Beetle brows, beetle-browed Forms , 4 bitel, bytel(l, 5 betyl, bittil, 6 beetell, -ill, -yll, 7 betle, bittle, 6– beetle [Found first in the comb beetle browed (1362), much later (1532), beetle is treated as a separate word, in beetle brow(s whence a derived verb to BEETLE (see next) formed by Shakspere

(As the 14 15th c. form had bitel , bytel it has been proposed to identify it with BITEL a biting cutting like a sharp-edged tool, used by Ormin and Layamon which is phonetically possible but, beside the hardly satisfactory sense, there is the difficulty that bitel appears to have been obsolete for 160 years when the first example of bitel browwed occurs. It is more likely that the word here is one of the two sbs. BEETLE, both extant in 14th c., and both having the form bitel The choice depends largely upon the exact meaning originally attached to 'beetle browed, which was a reproachful epithet, and appears to have re ferred to the shaggy prominence of the eye brows. (Brow in ME. was always = eyebrow, not = forehead.) It is probable therefore (as suggested by Dr F Chance) that the com parison is to the short tufted antennæ of some species of beetles projecting at right angles to the head, which may have been called 'eyebrows in Eng as well as in Fr , for in French the expression sourcils de hannoton 'cockchafers' eyebrows is the name given to a species of fringe made in imitation of the antennæ of these insects.])

Beghard (be gəɹd) [ad med L beghardus, begardus, beggardus, begehardus, beghardus (see Du Cange), cf F béguard, OF bégard, -art, Flemish leggaert, MHG beghart, begehard, either directly from the same word as Beguine (i e the surname Bègue), or at a later date from béguine itself, with the masc ending -ard, hard, here pejorative, see -ard OF had also a masc béguin, in which the pejorative sense was absent, and a fem béguarde formed on béguard, with its reproachful force

This word has been the subject of much etymological conjecture An extraordinary error, which appears even in Littré, refers it to an alleged Flemish beggen 'to beg,' which never existed (On the contrary, OF begard may be the source of the English beggar and beg, see these words.) It has been by some referred directly to the verb bègue stammering as if it meant originally 'stammerer and has been 'derived' in various other ways But its origination in the name of Lambert Begue is now established beyond all dispute (Prof Cosijn)]

A name given to the members of certain lay brotherhoods which arose in the Low Countries early in the 13th c, subsequent to, and in imitation of, the female Beguines 'They took no vow, and were allowed to leave the company when they liked' The name is said soon to have been adopted by many who were simply idle mendicants see Beggar From the 14th c they were denounced by Popes and Councils, and persecuted by the Inquisition In the 17th c such of them as still survived were absorbed in the Tertiary of the Franciscans (The name was sometimes thrown abusively at other 'heretics,' as the Albigenses and Waldenses)

Beho·lding, ppl a [f as prec + ING² Sense 1 evidently originated in an error for BEHOLDEN, either through confusion of the endings [cf esp the 15th c spelling -ynne for -en), or, more probably, after beholden was shortened to beholde, be hold, and its grammatical character obscured, the general acceptance of 'beholding' may have been due to a notion that it meant 'looking (e g with respect, or dependence),' or to association with the idea of 'holding of' or 'from' a feudal superior (It was exceedingly common in the 17th c for which no fewer than 97 instances have been sent in by our readers.)]

Belfry (be lfri) Forms (2–3 berefreid, ber freit), 4 berfrey, fray, froias, 5 barfray, 5–7 belfray(e, 6 belfroy bellfray, froy, belfrie, -fre, 6–7 belfery 6 belfrey, belfry (7 belfore, befroy, beffroy, 8 belfrey.) [ME. berfrey, ay a OF. ber frei, ai, ay (also berfroi, later belfroi, belfroi, befroi, mod. beffroi, pointing to a late L. type berefredus from *Teut. bergfrid, adopted f. Teutonic bergfrid*, in MHG. bercvrit, frit, berchfrit, berfrit (also berhfride), MDu. bergfert, frede, in sense I. below. The subsequent change of the first r to l by dissimilation from following r (as in armarium, almarium almerie, peregrinum, pelegrin, pilgrim, parasfedus, palefrei, palfrey) is common in later med. L., it is rare, and exceptional in Fr. (where the normal form dropped the r, befroi (beffroi), in Eng. belfray did not appear before 15th c., being probably at first a literary imitation of med. Lat.; its acceptance was doubtless due to popular association with BELL, and the particular application which was in consequence given to the word. The meaning has passed from a 'pent-house' a movable-tower' used by besiegers and besieged, to 'a tower to protect watchmen, a watch-tower, beacon-tower, alarm bell tower, bell-tower, place where a bell is hung'. The sense of 'pent house' or 'shelter shed' is retained dialectally in Lincolnshire and Notts.

The etymology of Ger. bergfrei berfrit presents some difficulties, but it is generally agreed that the latter part is in form of OHG. frida, OTeut. friþu, peace, security, shelter, place of shelter or safety (cf. the range of meaning of OE. friðu, friþ, ME. FRITH), the final vowel being dropped as in proper names, Gottfrid, Sigfrid, etc. and that the former part is the stem of berg-en to protect, defend, the whole meaning 'protecting' or defensive place of shelter,' an obvious description of a pent house fitted to ward off missiles from those to whom it gave shelter during siege operations. (The possibility that berg here means 'mountain' seems precluded by the sense but see the discussion of the word by Dr. Chance in N. & Q. VI. XII. 284, 413, etc.) For the form taken by bergfrid in Romanic, and thus in Eng., cf. the adoption of OHG. frida in late L. as fredus, fridus; proper names, the proper names from G. frid, Gottfridus, Godefrey, Gaffridus Geoffrey, and the ab. APPRAY, OF. esfrei, mod. effroi, parallel to berefrei, beffroi. Med.L. had the forms berefridus, berfredus, belbal, belfredus, berie balle bats, butifredus, with the latter of which cf. the It. battifredo, assimilated by popular etymology with battere to beat (the tocsin, to strike (as a clock).]

† 1 A wooden tower usually movable, used in the middle ages in besieging fortifications. Probably, in its simplest form, it was a mere shed or pent house, intended to shelter the besiegers while operating against a fortification, but in its developed form it was constructed with many offensive appurtenances, so as to make it a formidable engine of attack. I Properly

1 A hollow body of cast metal, formed to ring or emit a clear musical sound, by the sonorous vibration of its entire circumference, when struck by a clapper, hammer, or other appliance The typical form, found in all large bells (and indicated by the expression bell shaped), is that of an inverted deep cup with a recurving brim, which is struck by a 'clapper' or 'tongue,' usually suspended from the centre of the interior

Other forms used only in small bells are a section of a hollow sphere struck by a hammer impelled by a spring as in the bell of a house clock, a table bell etc , and a hollow sphere containing an unattached or freely suspended solid metal ball which answers the purpose of a tongue

Bells of the regular form vary greatly in size and we ght

a. The larger kinds are used for giving signals of various import (time danger, etc) to the inhabitants of a town or district, and especially in connexion with public worship (cf CHIME) the smaller kinds are used for similar purposes in a house (e g door-bell dinner-bell electric bell) b Small bells are frequently used for decoration e g on a horse s trappings a falcon s leg the cap of a fool or jester etc

The evidence at present available does not settle whether belu, belw, came down from a non palatalized form of OE belz, or from the plural inflexions belzu, belzum, while bels represented the sing forms belzs, belzes (cf ME sing dai des, pl daiwes —OE dæs, dazas), or, finally, whether it was a northern Eng adoption of ON belgr for each of these hypotheses something may be said Bellows is app not cognate with L follis see Ball *sb*1 and Belly]

1 An instrument or machine constructed to furnish a strong blast of air In its simplest form, it consists essentially of a combination of bag and box, formed of an upper and lower board joined by flexible leather sides, enclosing a cavity capable of expansion and contraction, and furnished with a valve opening inwards, through which air enters and fills the expanded cavity, and with a tube or nozzle, through which the air is forced out in a stream when the machine is compressed It has many modifications of form and structure according to its purpose, and the name is sometimes applied to the 'blower' of a blast furnace

2 An instrument or machine of this kind used to blow a fire, it may be portable, as the common hand-bellows, or fixed, as a smith's bellows Often, with reference to the two halves or handles, called a pair of bellows, rarely, as sing, a bellows

¶ Belt of pater-nosters or of Our Fathers

In the Acts of the Council of Celchyth an 816 (Haddan & Stubbs Councils & Eccl Doc III 584), occurs the passage et XXX diei us canonicus horis expletis synaxes et VII beltidum, Paternoster pro eo cantetur, of which the latter part 'at the seven bell hours let the Paternoster be sung for him has given rise to one of the most grotesque blunders on record The OE words at VII beltidum 'at the seven bell hours' a gloss to canonicus horis preceding were taken by Spelman as Latin, and construed with the following word as a 'pater noster of seven belts, which he explained as a rotary Du Cange repeated the explanation, though questioning the ex istence of the rosary at that date Johnson the Nonjuror (Eccl Laws 1720) elaborately described 'belts set with studs serving the purpose of a rosary Scott (Suppl to Chambers, 1753) suggested as a better rendering 'a pater noster to be repeated seven times. In all these there was an attempt to construe the passage but in later explana tions the grammatical construction has been dismissed, and 'VII beltidum, paternoster transmuted into 'seven belts of paternosters, as in the following curious specimens of modern mythology

1844 LINGARD Ang-Sax Ch (1858) II IX 62 The frequent repetition of the Lord's Prayer technically called a belt of Pater nosters. Note A belt of Pater nosters appears to correspond with a string of beads of later times It is probable that the belt contained fifty Pater nosters. 1849 ROCK Ch of Fathers III III 8 Seven belts of Our Fathers had to be said for the deceased

Beltane (be ltən) [Adopted in Lowland Scotch from Gaelic bealltainn bealtuinn (in Irish bealltaine, Manx boaltinn, boaldyn) the Celtic name of the first of May, the beginning of summer
OIr forms are beltene (in a text, belltaine, beltine in Cormac's Glossary 9th to 12th c) The first is prob the earliest quotable form of the word, of which the original meaning seems to have been unknown even to the glossarist since he makes a desperate guess at it by transposing bel tine or bil tene into tene bil and explaining bil as 'Bil from Bial, i e an idol god evidently meaning the Bel or Baal of the Old Testament so that bel tene became fire of Bel, or (?) Baal Dr Whitley Stokes has shown that the latter part of the word is not tene, fire, since this is a t stem OIr tene, tened, while Beltene is a feminine ya stem. Whether it can be a parallel derivative of the same root, or whether, as is more likely the notion that tane was = tene fire is due merely to popular etymology cannot be determined (The ancient Gaels kindled bonfires not only on Beltane but also on Lammas and Hallowmas) The rubbish about Baal, Bel, Belus, imported into the word from the Old Testament and classical antiquity, is outside the scope of scientific etymology]
1 The first day of May (reckoned since 1752 according to Old Style), Old May-day The quarter days anciently in Scotland were Hallowmas, Candlemas, Beltane, and Lammas Beltane day (Gael la bealltainn) appears sometimes to have been identified with the nearest Church Feast, the Invention of the Cross (May 3rd), and the name seems even to have been applied to Whitsunday (May 15th), when this took its place as term day

‖ 2 Name of an ancient Celtic anniversary celebration on May-day, in connexion with which great bonfires were kindled on the hills.
This use of the word appears in English much later than the preceding, and only as an alien term applied to the Celtic custom It may be the original use in Celtic Cormac's Glossary explains belltaine as 'two fires which the Druids used to make, and they used to bring the cattle [as a safe guard] against the diseases of each year to those fires. Also under Bil, 'a fire was kindled in his name at the beginning of summer always, and cattle were driven between the two fires Various accounts of Beltane observances lingering in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland are to be found in 18th c writers, and esp in the old Statistical Accts of Scotland 1794-99. A large number of these are collected in Jamieson

Bench-mark. A surveyor s mark cut in some durable material, as a rock, wall, gate-pillar, face of a building etc to indicate the starting closing, or any suitable intermediate, point in a line of levels for the determination of altitudes over the face of a country It consists of a series of wedge shaped incisures, in the form of the broad-arrow with a horizontal bar through its apex, thus ⅄ When the spot is below sea level, as in mining surveys, the mark is inverted

[The horizontal bar is the essential part, the broad arrow being added (originally by the Ordnance Survey) as an identification In taking a reading an angle iron is held with its upper extremity inserted in the horizontal bar so as to form a temporary bracket or bench for the support of the levelling staff which can thus be placed on absolutely the same base on any subsequent occasion Hence the name]

4. A shape or size in which ox- or cow hides are tanned into leather, forming half of a 'butt'

A 'butt' is the entire hide of the back and flanks reduced to a rough rectangle, by what is technically called 'rounding' i e cutting off the surrounding thinner parts (the hide of the head and shoulders, and of the belly and shanks on each side of the 'butt'). When this is cut in two by a line down the middle of the back, before tanning (as is mostly done in Scotland and the north of England), each half is called a 'bend' Butts and bends contain the thickest and strongest hide, the qualities of which are further developed by special processes in tanning, so as to make the stoutest leather Hence

The prepositional use of beneath seems originally to have been it troduced to express the general notion of lower than, as distinguished from the specific sense of Under But in process of time beneath was so largely used for under, that Below was laid hold of to express the more general idea. In ordinary spoken English, under and below now cover the whole field (below tending naturally to overlap the territory of under leaving under more or less as a literary and slightly archaic equivalent of both (in some senses), but especially of under The only senses in which beneath is preferred are 7 (beneath contempt) and fig uses of 4 (e g to fall beneath the assaults of temptation)

Bent bent), sb.[1] Also bennet [A word of difficult history. In the sense of 'stiff grass' or 'grass stalk' (in which alone the variant bennet occurs), it appears to be the representative of OI. beonet-, found as a frequent element in proper names, as Beonet Bath Bentley (see Index to Cod. Dipl. xvi Saxon. These names do not show the meaning, but beonet –earlier binut* (with eo as i- umlaut of e, in OS. binut Schade), is phonetically identical with OHG. binuz, MHG. binez, binz (str. masc.), mod.G. binse, rush, reed, stout grass growing in wet places. –WGer. binut*, of unknown etymology. But distinct instances of this sense are not found before the 15th c., while the sense of grassy field or surface' is common in northern writers from the earliest appearance of northern literature. Whether this is the same word is uncertain. It is possible enough that the pl. bents was used for a place where 'bents' grew (cf. local names like Tolley bents near Sheffield) and that this led to the use of the sing. bent as 'open grassy place.' They are here united provisionally.]

Britten and Holland Plant n. give a long list of grasses and other plants, to which the name, either simply or with attribute, is locally applied: by the seashore it very generally means the Sea Reed Grass, Psamma or Ammophila arenaria, but also Carex arenaria, Elymus arenarius, Triticum junceum, according to locality; on northern moor lands often Juncus squarrosus, but also Nardus stricta etc., in some pastoral and hay districts Cynosurus cristatus (Hendon Bent), Agrostis vulgaris, in other localities Phalaris arundinacea, Scirpus lacustris, or other marsh grasses, bulrushes, reeds, or sedges: in Chester and Wilt shire the name is even given to the common heath and ling, perhaps because they grow on bents of 'heath.'

Phonetically, OE beorn 'man of valour' answers exactly to ON bjorn, gen bjarnar, 'bear (—OTeut bernu z, the Celtic representative of which Prof Rhys sees in the Gaulish proper name Brennus), but the ON word has never the sense of 'warrior, while the OE has never that of 'bear' To this however a striking analogy is offered by the case of OE wigor ON sigrorr (—OTeut sēgurōz) sigor, which has in Old English only the sense of 'wild beast,' in ON only that of 'warrior hero The use of the name of a fierce animal as a fig appellation for warrior brave seems very natural and the fact that OE beorn belonged only to the language of poetry and is never found in prose, suggests that it was a word of which the literal sense was lost, and only a figurative one traditionally retained Nevertheless some eminent Teutonic scholars doubt the identification Some have considered the word to be an early variant of bearn Bairn or at least a cognate derivative of beran to Bear Mr H Bradley has suggested the possibility of connecting it with the British root of Boernicia Bernicia, Welsh bryneich and of Welsh brenhin king, but the nature of the connexion is not apparent]

Bet bet), sb Also 7–8 bett [Of uncertain origin nor is it clear whether the sb or the vb was the starting point if the sb, we may perhaps see in it an aphetic form of Abet sb in the sense of 'instigation encouragement, support, maintaining of a cause' see the quotation from Spenser under Abet sb 2 The vb would then be derived from the sb, as in the case of Wager sb and v It is less easy to get from the sense of Abet v to that of Bet v, since the original construction ought then to be, not 'to bet money on a champion,' etc, but 'to bet (i e abet) a champion with money,' of which no trace is found See however Abet v 4 in sense of 'to bet that'

(The suggestion that bet is —early Mr Brof, 'vow, promise, threat, has no support in the history or phonology)

The backing of an affirmation or forecast by offering to forfeit, in case of an adverse issue, a sum of money or article of value, to one who by accepting, maintains the opposite, and backs his opinion by a corresponding stipulation, the staking of money or other value on the event of a doubtful issue, a wager, also, the sum of money or article staked An even bet (fig) an equal chance, a balance of probabilities

(although in this form it has often since 1600 been mistaken for a contraction of beware! or an inter jectional use of the adjective) 2 OE had also an adj wær 'cautus, cautious, on one's guard,' which survived in ME as war, ware, common in the phrase to be ware 'to be on one s guard,' of which the imperative be ware! was practically = ware thee! aforesaid 3 From this equivalence of meaning, be ware early began to be treated in some respects as a single word, viz as a compound of the vb ware, thus stepping into the place of the OE bewarian As early as 1300 we find it written as one word, and even with by as the prefix, and in 14–15th c it often followed the verbal construc tions of the simple ware, even to taking a direct object, as in 'beware that train' (c 1500 in 1 e) But on the other hand it was used only in those parts of the vb where be is found, viz the imper, infin, and pres subj (the indic being I am ware, thou art ware, etc) After 1600, the verbal aspect so far prevailed that the inflexions bewares bewared, bewaring, were used by good writers, but these have again been discarded, and beware is now used only where be ware would be a possible construction, viz in the imper (chiefly), the infin, and pres subj (rarely) The full evidence of these statements will be found under WARE the follow ing quotations show the relations of to le ware, to ware oneself, ware thee, ware to thee, be ware to thee, beware thee, beware thyself before 1500

Bi, ME variant of By, a town

Bi, freq ME spelling of By prep the same as

Bi- *pref*1, the early OE, and the ordinary ME, form of the prefix Be-, under which spelling see most of the words Those alone are left under Bi- which did not survive long enough to be spelt with be-

Bi- *pref*2, a, I bi- (earlier dui-, cogn with Gr δι-, Skr dvi) 'twice, doubly, having two, two,' which is in Latin a prefix of adjs, occas of sbs, rarely of vbs (e g bipartire). The earliest Latin adjs of this type are formed by simply prefixing bi- either to adj- (and verb-) stems, as bifer, bifidus, bijugus, bisonus, or to sb- (and adj) stems, as bicolor, biceps, bifrons, bifurcus, bigener, later in all probability, and more evidently mere compounds, are those in which bi- is prefixed to an adj with a thematic suffix, as biennger, bicubitalis, bilongus, bipatens, and these are occas participial in form, as bicameratus, biformatus The Latin sbs, ending usually in -ium, are formed on the prec adjs, or possible ones of corresponding type, as biennium a space of two years, biennis lasting two years, biclinium, biclinus*.

The prefix entered Eng in composition, e g in bigam (=med L bigamus), found c 1300, bicorne, c 1420, bifront, biforked occur late in 16th c., and from the 17th c onward, by a wide extension of the Latin analogy, especially in its later phases, bi- has been prefixed to any adj conveniently indicating the thing or quality which is to be described as doubled or occurring twice, principally to those of Latin etymology, as in biangular, bicavitary, bicentral, bivaulted, bivoluminous, but also to others as bisawny, bisweekly In modern scientific terminology, adjs in -ate, ated are most frequently employed, as biauriculate, bicarinate, bilamellate, bipinnate, biunguiculate, bimaculated, and the attrib use of sbs as adjs tends to such modern forms as bichord, birchrel (See also the form Bin)

Bi- is therefore used in Eng to form —

The Gr βιβλία was pl. of βιβλίον, dim of βίβλος (1 the inner bark of the papyrus 'paper , 2 a paper, scroll, roll or book), which had ceased to have a diminutive sense, and was the ordinary word for 'book, whether as a distinct treatise, or as a subdivision of a treatise, before its application to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. In Latin, the first appearance of biblia is not ascertained Jerome uses bibliotheca for the Scriptures and that name continued in literary use for several centuries. Of biblia, Becker, Antiq Biblioth, Antiq 42, has a 9th c. example (see also those under sense 2 below but the evidence of the Romanic langs shows that biblia must have been the popular name, and have been treated as a fem sing much earlier than this. The common change of a Lat neuter pl. into a fem sing in -as in arma lat talia, folia, gaudia, gesta operu, etc) was in the case of biblia facilitated by the habit of regarding the Scriptures as one work. In OE bibliopēce alone occurs in Angl Latin biblia and bibliotheca interchange in the 11th c catalogue of the library of Durham books only biblia occurs.]

[A OE. bīodan, bīad, budon, boden, = OS biodan (MDu. and Du bieden), OHG biotan (MHG and mod G. bieten), ON bióða, Goth. biudan (pa t bauþ, budum, pple. budans):—OTeut beudan* 'to stretch out, reach out, offer, present,' hence 'to communicate, inform, announce, proclaim, command'; pre-Teutonic bheudh-*, cogn with Skr budh to present, and perh with Gr πυθ- (for φυθ-) in πυθέσθαι 'to inform oneself' From the pa pple. boden was derived the sb. boda messenger, whence the vb bodian to BODE, announce The normal ME forms were bīde(n, pa. t. bead, bēd, beed, pl. buden, pa. pple boden But by form-levelling, the pa. t had also pl bēden, bēd(e from the sing , and later also bod(e, by assimilation to the pa pple.

B OE. biddan, bæd, bǽdum, beden, = OS biddian (MDu. and Du. bidden), OHG. and mod.G. bitten, ON. biðja, Goth. bidjan (pa t baþ, bǽdum, pple. budans) '= OTeut. bhedh-* 'to press' (cf Skr. bādhate to press), whence the senses 'to ask pressingly, beg, pray, require, demand, command.' (Osthoff would connect bidjan with Gr πείθω.) The normal ME. forms were bidde(n, pa. t. bad, pl. beaden, bede(n, pa pple beden By form-levelling the pa t had also occasionally sing bead, bēd, beed, and at length pl baden, baide, bad; and the pa. pple became bidden, whence also a later pa. t. bid

C Thus the sense 'command' had been developed in both verbs already in OE. The past tenses were further confused in form in ME The result was the frequent substitution of the forms of one verb for the other, in other senses also, and their total confusion after 1400–1500. As a whole, the forms of biddan, bid are those which survive in literary Eng, but in the dialects these are quite mixed, in such conjugations as bid, bad or bod, bodden or budden. Senses survive from both verbs, though mostly archaic, or in certain unanalysed phrases, as to 'bid farewell,' 'bid a truce,' 'bid fair'; the chief modern use is that of 'bid at an auction,' 'bid for votes or support,' which belongs to bede. The senses of 'invite' and 'order' are in every-day use in the north, but archaic in southern speech, where 'bid him do it' is regularly made 'tell him to do it' Particular forms of the pa t and pa. pple. are preferred with particular senses.]

A. Senses originating from OE. bīodan, ME. bede, but taking eventually the form bid).

The bede quotations are marked a, the bid quotations β

6 Buildings of heads, heads of Vine, Bidding of prayers, bidding prayer As to these expressions there has been a series of curious misapprehensions The original meaning down to the Reformation was 'praying of prayers,' i e saying of prayers, praying, cf Bid v 7e From an early date in the Christian church, it was the custom to request the prayers of the faithful in behalf of certain persons and things, and in the 16th c, in England, forms of allocution or direction to the congregation, telling them whom and what to remember in 'bidding their beads' or 'prayers' were authoritatively put forth As bid in the sense of 'pray' was now becoming obsolete, the meaning of the expression was forgotten after the Reformation and bid taken in the sense of 'order, direct,' so that in the reign of Elizabeth the 'bidding of prayers' was applied to the allocution itself, as if 'the directing or injoining of prayers' With the later use of the vbl sb as a gerund directly governing an object, we have in the 17th c 'the form of bidding prayers' or 'prayer' (= precationem hortandi), and later still, a misunder standing of the grammatical construction in this phrase has given rise to the vulgar error of calling this exhortation to the people (in which 'concionatores populum hortabuntur ut secum in precibus concurrat' Sparrow Collect Articles, 1671) 'the bidding prayer' as if it were itself a kind of prayer qualified by the attribute 'bidding'

[In OF Bigot appears first in the romance of Gerart de Rousillon (12th c.) as the proper name of some people ap parently of the south of Gaul Hence already in the 17th c. it was suggested by Caseneuve, that it might be an OF form of Wisigothus, Visigoth, the relations between the Visigoths of Toulouse who were Arians and the Franks who were Catholics, being such as readily to attach to the name of the former the connotation of 'detestable foreigner' or foreign heretic But modern Romanic scholars find phonetic difficulties, besides that there is no evidence that the name Wisigothi was preserved in the vulgar tongue Slender support to some connexion with the Goths is sug gested by the med L. form Bigothi (Du Cange). Whether the Sp bigote, moustache, is in any way connected, can not be decided. According to Wace bigos bigot was applied opprobriously by the French to the Normans, which shows that the word had then acquired some connotative force, the legend that it originated in the refusal of Hrolf or Rollo to kiss the foot of Charles the Simple, when, in the words of the 12th c. chronicler, 'lingua Anglica (11) respondit Ne se ïs got, quod interpretatur Ne per Deum (No by God !), is absurdly incongruous with facts The opprobrious sense in Wace was certainly not that of super stitious or 'hypocrite as in later F and Eng , materials to show how the latter was developed are wanting, but there is evidence to show that the feminine bigote was sub sequently applied in opprobrium to the Beguines (see Be guta Biguita, in Du Cange) our first quotation identifies bigot with bigin or beguine In early times the word be came a Norman family name as in Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk]
